King George School closing Amy Ash Nixon staff writer SUTTON - High school graduation always brings mixed emotions, but for King George School Class 2011, graduation June 4 will be the last day of school. School officials stated Friday that the medical boarding school will be closed for the usual at the end of the semester. The school is owned by the Global Health Service Corporation in King Pruss, Penn., which bought the school during bankruptcy proceedings in 2005. Friday's phone call with the World Health Service was not returned. Trying to talk to the current head of the school, Gerard Jones, has not been successful in the past week. A request for information about the number of schoolchildren was not answered. Jones, however, said 35 people would lose their jobs. Since its founding in the late 1990s, King George School has delivered the highest level of academic and medical services to bright and creative students from across the North, said information provided to the school community earlier this week, according to employee Lisa Goodell. In recent years, the school has failed to maintain the continued enrollment levels of students necessary to maintain the financial viability of the program, without compromising the quality of education, health services and the vibrant lives of the community necessary to support our students. For the remaining four weeks of the current semester, there will be no change in any aspect of King George's plan. Dr. Karen Fitzog, former dean of King George's School, said Friday that she was deeply saddened by the news. He became head of the school in 2004. Fitzog said King George has been in business since 1999. She is establishing a private school for young women in The City of Helum. I've not been [at King George School] for almost four years, Fitzog said Friday. He said with a school that depends on referrals, it can be difficult to keep the registration required to make the numbers work financially. When you have enough students, there's a particular point to decide, he says. They've stood behind and aired for a long period of time, she says. I know I had a little blood, sweat and tears in the dirt up there when bankruptcy occurred on her watch, not long after she moved in. From Texas, his family helped with the salary and lent some of the proceeds from the sale of his home in Texas to keep the school afloat while trying to figure out how not to be forced to close during the former owner's bankruptcy and ordered liquidation. Fitzog said the first long wind project, which will surround the school in horseshoes with 16 long turbines more than 400 feet tall, is not a small piece of equation either. King George's School has been one of the revisionists in the fight against the wind farm. The Wind Farm Forever changed the landscape around the school, set in a scenic location with beautiful views, Fitzugh said. I was sorry to learn that the school was closing, says John Lamontagen, first director of Wind Communications. It was revealed at the time that the project would not affect the school. A check in Ston's city clerk's office on Friday revealed that the school, which has 174 acres and is among its largest taxpayers, paid $50,308.64 in taxes this year and a share of the city's tax base of 3.08 percent.
